UNIVERSITY HAS NEW PRINTING CAMERA WITH AN AUTOMATIC FOCUS

The College of Agriculture has a new projection printer which is used by the agricultural photographer, J. F. Barham, to enlarge pictures from the negatives too small to be of any educational value otherwise.

The unique feature of the new machine is that it is automatically focused. This focusing is done by the working of a gun which has been arranged to follow a plotted curve. Each point in the camera is carefully studied so as to conform with the action of the camera shutter if the camera was placed at a known distance from the paper on which the object is to be projected. The camera is pointed eastward and is held in place and position by an iron arm which can be lowered or raised, according to the size of the picture wished. The easel is placed horizontal, instead of perpendicular. The raising or lowering of this arm regulates the action of the gun, consequently automatically focusing the camera.

The machine will handle any size negative smaller than one 5 1/2 inches by 7 inches, and will print any size enlargement up to one 40 inches by 50 inches. The light used on the machine is 230 watts, nitrogen filled bulb. The light in the camera is worked by foot power.

this leaving both hands free to attend to the picture.

By special diffusion stops, scratches and other blemishes, so often shown on the negatives and brought out more clearly by the old machine, are almost entirely done away with.

A new apparatus placed on the paper on which the object is to be shown enables the photographer to mark the picture more accurately.

DOCTOR GINSBURG WAS HERE

Missionary to Brazil Told of Progress of Christianity.

Dr. S. Ginsburg, one of the first missionaries to Brazil, told the members of the B. Y. P. U. and gave a stereoscopic lecture at the church services at the Baptist Church Sunday night, showing the progress of Christianity during his thirty years work there.

Doctor Ginsburg is on a furlough and while in the United States is going about from place to place telling of the work in Brazil. His son is now in the University and his daughter, Claire, was graduated from the School of Journalism last spring.

When Doctor Ginsburg went to Brazil thirty years ago there were practically no protestants there. The natives were in a state of superstitious ignorance. There was opposition to the work; even the government was against him, though they gave him personal protection. The religious meetings were continually broken up by showers of stones.

At one time some persons had sworn to kill him if he held a meeting in a certain town. Doctor Ginsburg heard of it and appealed to the government. He was promised protection. Several stations before he reached the place six armed men got on the train. He asked why they had come to guard him so soon.

They replied that the bandits, knowing that he was coming and that he would be protected when he reached the town, were going to try to get him on the road. Sure enough, later some suspicious looking characters got on the train, but seeing that he was so well guarded, decided to leave him alone. When he reached the town, there was a company of men lined up on each of the way from the train to the street. Then the entire band accompanied him to the theater where he was to preach. This precaution the government knew was necessary to keep him from being murdered.

Another meeting he was holding was interrupted by three men. One of them killed the man at the door with a scythe and then attacked Doctor Ginsburg. But instead of striking him, they struck the light, putting the room in darkness so that everybody was able to escape, except the man who had been killed at the door. Scarcely a meeting was held during the pioneer missionary days that was not interrupted in some such way.

But today there are 252 Baptist churches in Brazil with 25,000 members; 530 preaching stations; two Baptist colleges with more than five hundred students in each one and a printing plant costing over $30,000. The churches are entirely supported by the natives.

Traveling in Brazil is very difficult, according to Doctor Ginsburg. There are no railroads along the coast and a few automobiles, but three-fourths of Brazil is still undiscovered territory and the mode of travel is chiefly by ox cars, which make about five miles a day. In the forests pack mules are used, which are able to stand a great deal.

"Brazil is the coming storehouse of the world," said Dr. Ginsburg. "It is larger than the United States and its resources are untouched. Three-fourths of it is trackless forest, inhabited by savage tribes. It is a wonderful opportunity for the young well educated man."
